Postpartum depression is a significant mental health problem that occurs more frequently in the first 4 weeks postpartum and may also occur later during the first postpartum year. Women who receive in-vitro fertilization (IVF) treatment have a particular perinatal experience that may create postpartum mental health concerns. The purpose of this cross-sectional study was to evaluate factors associated with postpartum depression in women who received in-vitro fertilization treatment. Sixty of 71 eligible postpartum women who were treated at an infertility treatment center and conceived by IVF were included in this study using a self-administered structured questionnaire. The prevalence of postpartum depression was 25%, including mild (16.7%), moderate (6.7%) and severe depression (1.7%). Pearson correlation analysis showed the frequency of receiving IVF treatment and perceived stress were positively correlated with postpartum depression, while family function and social support were negatively correlated with postpartum depression.
